
El Nuevo Mundo is a remix of the 1824 novel, Robinson Crusoe by Daniel Defoe. The movie was made in Mexico and is set in a deserted island not too far from GMT-4. In this movie it seems that all things are possible. The director has created a paradise for the audience to see what they have been patiently waiting for, paradise with no social interference designed to hinder their happiness.

While watching this film I noticed a lot of vengeful schemes where people tried to take advantage of each other and most times it backfires on them in the end . I feel like this movie was very realistic in its point of view on how humans never change (no matter the time period). It is clear to me based on the events in this film that human nature has not changed since the beginning of times. The director has expressed his views through this contemporary version of Defoes novel, in which he describes how man will always be caught in the same vicious circle of suffering no matter how hard he tries to escape or avoid it. I believe that anyone who is being tricked will ultimately get their revenge on you by not giving up until they are satisfied. It seems that no matter the era, human nature will remain the same. I would have liked to have seen more of these characters in this film, I felt like this was only a small part of them life. The main character could have been expanded upon because he has no family or business which limits me to judge him. It also seemed like most of the residents were young and single who weren't married yet by the end of the movie; I would have liked to see more elderly people in this film as well, my age is around 60 and it doesn't seem like they show that many older people in films like these anymore. I think there is a large market for people my age who love this genre of film, which is why I would have liked to see more of them. The directing of the film was very cool, I liked how they did a lot of panning and looked mostly below the actors eyes. It seemed like they did a lot of times where they zoomed in on the characters faces from an extreme close up so you could see every detail on their faces, another technique they used was camera shaking while filming, which made me feel like I was an actual person in the movie. In conclusion this movie left me feeling very satisfied with its ending because it had a happy ever after that everyone will love and enjoy while watching it.
