In "C# Coroutines in Depth", it says: By default, a method is considered to be a coroutine if its signature contains a yield return statement. And this is true if you write a method like the following: static Task

GetInt(int x) { // Some code to produce a value. return Task.FromResult(val); } However, if you write a method like the following: static Task GetInt() { return Task.FromResult(0); } It is considered a normal method because there is no yield return statement. Then, in "Continuations" it says: A coroutine is any method that returns a Task and has at least one yield return statement in its body. However, if you write a method like the following: static Task GetInt(int x) { // Some code to produce a value. return Task.FromResult(val); } It is considered a coroutine because it has a yield return statement. Now I'm confused. It seems both rules are true, but only one rule makes more sense. Should I consider every method with a yield return statement as a coroutine or not? A: The coroutine designation is only given to methods that have a yield return statement. A method that returns Task from a Task is not a coroutine, even if it has a yield return statement. You can think of it as this: A coroutine is any method that returns a Task (even if the task returns an ordinary value). A method that returns Task from a Task is not a coroutine (even if it has a yield return statement). A: Also, we have
