Speed UP Shut Down is a great utility that does not only let you restart your computer, but also shut it down. However, if you just want to shut down your computer, there are a few other programs that can do the job just as well. Nonetheless, Speed UP Shut Down is a very good program. Why? Because this program does what it is supposed to do: it lets you shut down your computer with a lot of speed and efficiency. This way, you will not have to wait for hours to accomplish such task, which is not very convenient in many situations. This application is extremely easy to use. For starters, you only need to click on the desired option and wait for a few seconds. You will see your computer power down in no time. The program is designed to be compatible with any version of Windows, not just Windows XP. If you do not have Windows XP, you can still use Speed UP Shut Down. To do so, you have to transfer the application to the computer you want to use, which means that you are going to have to install it to the hard drive. If you are planning to install the application, you should know that it does not require any installation. All the features available in the program are free. The program does not have any drawbacks. However, it is important to know that the application is only available in English. Search giant Google has updated its search engine to include a feature that would automatically suggest a list of popular apps whenever you search for certain terms on a mobile device. The new feature appears as a 'suggested app' along with the name of an app in the results page. While Android users may already be familiar with a similar 'App of the Day' feature, which shows one app every day, the 'suggested app' feature on Google's web search engine has a few extra benefits. When you search for a particular keyword, you will be shown a list of popular apps that contain that term in their name or title. The function, which is now live on the Google search page, also includes suggestions for Google Play in the 'App of the Day' feature, and the Android Market in the new 'Top Search' section. According to a new report from Nielsen, about four in ten American consumers don't believe the word "Apple" can be used to describe their favorite company. To add insult to injury, the company is making a move to aggressively market the iPod touch, iPhone, and iPad under a single brand. The research released today found that only 8 percent of US consumers believe that "Apple" is a brand that can be used to describe their favorite company, down from 10 percent last year. In fact, it now takes a full 33 percent of consumers to believe that the moniker is a brand that can be used to describe a company, compared to 27 percent in 2010. Further evidence of the degree to which the iPhone and iPod touch are losing their luxury brand status comes from the fact that the study found that only 26 percent of consumers believe they can be described as luxury products, down from 35 percent last year. Likewise, Nielsen found that only 30 percent of consumers consider the iPhone and iPod touch luxury products, down from 42 percent in 2010. It's no wonder that the tech market has seen the value of the iPhone shrink. For years, consumers across the globe flocked to an iPhone because it was a luxury product, one that defined a new class of high-end smartphones. As the market has matured, that luxury has slowly given way to "just another" smartphone. Nielsen found that 48 percent of consumers are either indifferent to or view the iPhone negatively due to its lack of high-end features. The decline of high-end smartphones has given rise to a rise in low-cost smartphones that consumers can get for under $200. “We’ve been in this market a long time, and our research shows that Apple is a brand that resonates with consumers on all levels,” said Scott Wintner, senior director of consumer insights for Nielsen, in a statement. “These trends are a key indicator that as mobile-only devices become more mainstream, the categories that they were once able to define are increasingly becoming subsumed by a broader smartphone ecosystem.” Despite the number of consumers that have turned against the iPhone and iPod touch, Nielsen found that the devices still remain a major source of revenue for Apple. The company took in $37.4 billion in mobile device sales in 2013, and that number was on the rise. The market for smartphones is certainly mature, and the advent of the low-cost smartphone has made these devices more mainstream, but Apple◆
