That's what we've been doing the past four days.

If it looks like the last match was a mere three weeks ago, it was. Why has it taken us this long to get back to this blog post? I'll tell you why. I haven't been playing Smash 4 for two weeks, so I haven't been doing much with the Wii U. I haven't been getting much time to practice fighting professionally at tournaments. Instead, I've just been playing Mario Kart 8, Street Fighter V, and Fortnite. However, we're back. The Wii U has been slowly picking up steam, and I'm more than happy to see that. Nintendo has been gaining more support from the companies that are selling its first-party games (The Legend of Zelda: Breath of the Wild, Splatoon 2, Mario Kart 8) and publishers are giving the system more attention (both the E3 show as well as Game Awards). My predictions for the Wii U's place in the 2020 field? The Nintendo Switch won't crash and burn, although it could take a slight hit in the singles' category. There will be a winner and a runner-up for the Nintendo 64 games, and nostalgia will win out in the run-up to the next generation. But more than that, there's also an issue of subpar games and developer quality. First, there's a fairly good chance that Nintendo is a little confused. The Nintendo 64 was a game console that was able to cross into more genres than any of the other consoles. Not only did it sell well, but it's also produced some of the best games of all time. While I wouldn't say that it had the best lineup of games, it also produced some of the best. Super Metroid, GoldenEye 007, Killer Instinct, Super Punch-Out!!, and the original Star Fox are four of the best games ever made, and Super Mario 64 has a special place in my heart. To add to that list, we have games like Super Mario Galaxy, Mario Party, Pikmin, Super Mario RPG: Legend of the Seven Stars, Mario Kart, Yoshi's Island, and so on. It's a terrible problem to have. The Wii U suffered from both of those issues. As I've said before, it wasn't the best game console in the world, but it was at least the most diverse. It sold well and 648931e174
