That could include everything from extending human lifespans by 100 years to completely creating new worlds to maintaining colonies on other planets. "In the near future, it's very unlikely we'll be able to travel to Mars without some kind of a new propulsion system," Burke said. "The closer you get to light speed, the harder it is to generate thrust. And Mars is quite a bit farther away than Pluto, so the rockets won't be nearly as big. "We've done a lot of work on what we call extreme propulsion systems, and that involves development of technologies that tap into the structure of a material itself to create an internal propulsion effect." For example, Burke said, plasma thrusters could be used to generate propulsion on Earth as well as in space, while a laser approach could allow a spacecraft to slow down in close proximity to a planetary body, such as a moon, and then be propelled back up at high velocity. "Lasers can be both a push and pull mechanism," Burke said. "In a vacuum, they can create drag and that can be used to alter trajectories. "I actually have a two-year-old child. When I was a teenager, I would have loved to be able to talk to my kids tomorrow, tell them where they are and what they are doing. In 100 years, that could be a reality. "But I also think there will be much more advanced technologies. Artificial intelligence will be much more capable. We could conceivably create a whole generation of robots that do everything that we do now. "The reality is, we haven't reached the limits of what our brains can do. There's a tremendous amount we can do and will do."Q:
